ON THE LOSS OF THE CHILD JESUS

St. Joseph and the Blessed Virgin having travelled "a day's journey" from Jerusalem, on their way to Nazareth; and thinking that the child "was in another company," for they went in several companies, at night they missed the child, and seeking among their kinsfolk and acquaintance, they found Him not.

In which I must consider the design of Almighty God in ordaining to afflict these saints without any fault of theirs, and on the occasion of a good work which they did to honour Him, and in a thing which might most of all grieve them, which was the loss of such a child. All which He contrived in order to exercise them in patience, humility, and fervent diligence, and in other virtues that were resplendent in the Blessed Virgin, and in Saint Joseph, in this case, for our example.

Their patience was resplendent, because they were not troubled, nor lost the tranquillity of their souls, nor complained of our Lord; but enduring this loss by yielding to God's ordinance, though it was an exceeding great loss.

Their humility, because, like good people, they feared a fault or a negligence where none was, or at least they attributed this to their own unworthiness ; they feared lest our Lord would already leave them, and follow some other course of life, or lest they themselves had omitted their duty in looking after Him, and they confessed themselves to be unworthy of His company.

Their diligence, because they went forthwith to seek Him, full of solicitude and pain to comply with their obligation, and love urged them on; and though they sought Him among their kinsfolk and acquaintance; yet, for all this, they found Him not, for if Christ would have been with any of His kinsfolk, He would soonest have been with His mother.

To these three things was added the fourth of fervent and long prayer. And especially I will ponder what a sad night that was to the Blessed Virgin, how solitary she was without her son, and how she spent it wholly in meditating and mourning like a dove, praying with great zeal, and beseeching the eternal Father not so soon to deprive her of the care of her son, but to look after Him wherever He was, and not long to defer the restoring Him again.
