SAINT PIUS V LAST DAYS AND DEATH

The active life is concerned with men and things; the contemplative is in the realm of supreme truth and has to do with the very principle of life, Almighty God. "Christianity's chief business" St. Thomas Aquinas says, "is the union of these two lives:" but the contemplative is better than the active:

What else but this constant uniting of spiritual contemplation and active works, with preference given to the former, so marvellously maintained by Michael Ghislieri throughout his life as monk, Prior, Bishop, Cardinal, and Pontiff, was the source of the radical and far-reaching spiritual and temporal reforms Pius V was able to bring about, in but six years of pontificate, for the church and Christian civilization? Whether fighting heresy within, or enemies without, dealing with disloyal Emperor and wayward sovereigns abroad or vice and lawlessness in his own States and Rome, he was all the while by his own self-denial, penances and piety drawing more and more people back to the Faith and practice of true religion.

From time to time, leaving the Vatican where he lived in a small suite of rooms away from the great state apartments, Pope Pius would take up residence in the Dominican Monastery of Santa Maria Sopra Minerva, or at Santa Sabina on the Aventine hill. Therein the still greater silence and peace of the cloister, the Pope whose culminating act in his work of spiritual reform had been to proclaim St. Thomas a Doctor of the church would live again, sometimes for a few days, as a simple religious, regathering spiritual and physical strength for further enterprise.

The day before he died, Pius V wished to get up and celebrate Mass for the last time, offering himself in holocaust at the altar. But this he could not do, and had to be satisfied with hearing Mass in his room.

On the last day of April, aware that his death was approaching, he asked for the last Sacraments, first rising and going down on his knees, to humble himself before God. He desired to die in his Dominican habit. On May 1, in great agony, he lay motionless, except for constant kissing of the crucifix. Those nearest him made out the words, alternated with the prayers he was murmuring: "Lord increase my pain, but may it please Thee also to increase my patience." With this heroic act of love, in utmost peace, and features never before radiant, Pius V dies. On opening his body, the Doctors found stones of such size that they wondered how he had been able to live with the pain they must have caused.
